I'm working on a counting system, and I have trouble with finding the sum of the numbers in the strings. The program is supposed to find if the string contains both "le" and "hé", and it should return "blé" (in fact it return "blé" and "blé", why?). The first part is easy, I just have to calculate the size of the string. The part I can't figure out is: "return "blé" (in fact it return "blé" and "blé", why?). When I try to output the sum of the number of the string, I get a wrong sum, instead of the correct one.

#include #include int findme(char *str);
int main() { char *str =
(char*)calloc(200,sizeof(char)); printf("Insert string :

"); scanf("%s",str); printf("Return value : %s",findme(str)); return 0; } int findme(char str) { int l=0; int h=0; int hcnt=0; for(l=0;(str+l)!=0;l++) { if((str+l)=="le") { h++; hcnt++; } if((str+l

For the series' final season, the show's creators decided to go for broke, hiring series showrunners David Fincher and Beau Willimon to reshape the show for a drastically different style and tone. The result is a standout season full of great performances, memorable action, and excellent political subtext. The season one finale left us with several storylines unresolved, including the trials of former Vice President Francis Underwood (Kevin Spacey), whom we learned was killed in a plane crash. The two-part season two finale finally brought us closure on that mystery — Spacey's Underwood is back, not dead after all! — but there were still plenty of loose ends left to tie up. Here, EW takes a deep dive into the two-part season two finale of House of Cards to close out some of those dangling storylines, analyze what we learned from the finale, and 2d92ce491b
