Dec 9, 2017 Download the Galaxy S9's firmware on the international version. This is available for download via Samsung's official servers. The issue is a security vulnerability in a piece of software called 'Download Monitor', that came preinstalled on all Samsung devices for over a year. It is a company, owned by the two largest South Korean tech companies, Samsung and SK Hynix. Samsung is the manufacturer and the one which sold millions of Galaxy S9 and S9+. The two tech companies have only a 5% share in the global smartphone market and just 8% in the US. Other companies like Huawei and Google have also released patches. No one knows when the first patch was released or when the issues were fixed in the international version of Galaxy S9. Samsung is also checking if it can help users who are facing problems with the phone (can't use it) to receive a new version of the software for the bug to be fixed. Samsung is also checking if the patch will help with previous versions. Samsung is checking if they are able to fix it in a few months. In this case the bug is not in the phone but in the software. So here you are now able to know if your Galaxy S9 has the vulnerability. The US version of the phone is not affected because it was sold in the state of Illinois, which is the only place the software had been tested. The main reason for the bug to be there is because Samsung was able to save money and weren't willing to fix it. So the bug was there for a year and after the problem was discovered by users the bug was fixed in the market. There are many users who have no problems with their phones and want to wait for the update before the bug is 2d92ce491b
