Category:SoftwareNot only has Google been building its own homegrown Android smartphone, but it is also open-sourcing its own Open-source Operating System. The company officially announced the OS at its I/O conference on Wednesday, and it is based on an engine called Go. And just like Android, it is designed for the masses. The Go code is "a cloud-optimized, multi-process system designed for mobile systems," according to a Google blog post. The code is available under the Apache 2.0 license, which means it is free and open to the public, provided a citation is provided. "When it comes to engineering a system that can execute on a wide variety of hardware, Go is a platform that makes this kind of approach very viable," said Google engineer Raymond Toy. "Android runs on many systems, but few of them run at a fraction of the clock speed we need for Go, and Android is not a suitable target for our multi-core engine." Google is currently targeting two main applications for the OS: building new applications for mobile-connected gadgets (such as phones and tablets) and creating a new browser for mobile-enabled computers and portable media devices. As for Android, Google introduced a new version of its mobile OS for phones and tablets on Wednesday. Google said it has "accelerated" the development of its mobile platform so that it will now be available on the first commercially available smartphone made by Motorola. "With Ice Cream Sandwich, we are delivering the speed, richness and polish we set out to with Android two years ago," Android chief Andy Rubin said in a press release. "We have learned a lot from creating this mobile platform, and we are now focused on extending its capabilities with further development of Android for phones and tablets." Rubin added, "We believe Android is the fastest-growing major OS platform in the world." So 2d92ce491b
