REUTERS/Michael Dalder The companies confirmed on Tuesday that KUKA rejected the offer and that Meilenstein's offer remains on the table. KUKA chief executive Walter Dehnert said the German firm was keen to strengthen its position in the market, with no definitive plans for a future merger but open to other options. KUKA shares had fallen as much as 19 percent by midday on Tuesday on the news, but recovered to close down 7.9 percent. Dehnert, who will remain KUKA CEO until a permanent successor is found, told Reuters he believed that KUKA's status as a small company in the robot industry was an advantage. "If you're one of the leading companies in the world in the robot industry, you know exactly who you want to take over. If you're a small company, it's a bit harder to select the right company," Dehnert said. Dehnert declined to elaborate on KUKA's value, but said it was worth more than $5 billion. KUKA is Germany's third-largest robot maker, behind industrial giant Hyundai and Bos 2d92ce491b
