Good morning from Washington, where it's "sunny" and the National Weather Service says today will be pretty much like every other day of the year: A few clouds, the sun, and not a whole lot of snow. Your odds are good: According to the National Climatic Data Center, the chances of winter weather are more than 50 percent today. But that can't be the whole story. And, yes, you should check your tires. This is the centennial of a year that saw a different kind of weather. Nine months later, at the beginning of the year, the Associated Press ran a story headlined "NATIONAL WEATHER SERVICE: A TOUCH OF CLASSIC WEATHER." A blizzard had been unleashed on Chicago, and another was barreling up the East Coast. It was January 1916. The story pointed out that weather forecasters were in their infancy. We can be grateful for one thing: In the year just passed, nobody had ever forecast snow in Florida in the middle of May, and had never said "sunny" could accompany "nearly a foot of snow." The story went on to report the number of forecasters was growing, and that many of them did not understand the science of what they were doing. "The average weather man of today is a graduate of a leading weather school," the story said. "That school did not turn out too many weather men." Makes you wonder what the schools would have taught them. I'm going to go back to my desk and take my 7:30 Alaskan flight. Contact Allie Rieck at arieck@tampabay.com. Follow @AllieRieck.
