Apr 14, 2015.Stressors in the workplace: a pilot study of employee experience using the Higher-Order Ambiguity Model (HOAM). Information technology and restructuring continue to generate widespread stress in the workplace. This study focuses on one model of a worker's experience of stress at work--the Higher-Order Ambiguity Model (HOAM). Using cognitive dissonance theory as a framework, the authors examine the relationships among four dimensions of the HOAM (cognitive, contextual, normative, and affective) in determining an individual's sense of stress. The findings show that cognitive and normative responses (over- and undercommitment to work) are more important in predicting stress-related feelings and behaviors than contextual or affective factors. Implications of this study for managing and teaching stress at work are discussed.Markets Update: Altcoin Stocks Are Crashed with Bitcoin Bulls Baffled Cryptocurrency markets are very volatile and cryptocurrency buyers often purchase at the slightest sign of opportunity.
