(11) Handle the apparatus as little as possible: no nimbly flicking switches, rotating knobs, and so on. This will eliminate wear and tear of the apparatus and it will make the overall life of the apparatus longer. (12) Keep the apparatus clean: you have to use a broom, dustpan, or vacuum to remove dust and other types of debris that can get into the apparatus. Make sure the apparatus is thoroughly cleaned out every now and then. (13) Use an AC cord: many of the products now come with an AC cord. Try not to use an extension cord with an AC cord unless you have to. AC cords are expensive and by using one you are actually prolonging the life of the apparatus. (14) Use only what you need: your battery bank has to be used responsibly. Do not use it just to run things for a short period of time. Instead, use it when you need it. (15) Keep it sealed: make sure that the battery compartment is sealed so that any dust or moisture that enters the battery compartment does not get on the battery and short it out. (16) Store it properly: make sure that you are storing the battery in a safe and secured location. Even if it is in the back of your closet, make sure that it is covered from the elements. So to sum up, here are some simple tips to keep your battery banks going strong: (1) Check the performance of your battery banks: even if you do not want to use your battery bank, it is important that you monitor the performance of the batteries so that they last long. (2) Stay on top of maintaining your battery banks: batteries last longer if you keep an eye on them. If you are going on vacation for a few days or if you are not using the battery bank, then you should drain the batteries completely. (3) Check your charging options: whether you want to charge a few batteries or a whole bunch of batteries, make sure that you check if your charger has enough power to do the job. Any American who believes that it is OK to treat children in so-called "alternative" education settings should look to the case of Mike Farris, a recent graduate of Beeson High School in San Antonio who refused to be cowed by the threat of disciplinary action for challenging the legality of his school's drug and alcohol policy.
