Repaintings Thomas Sowell, in his book Human Migration and the World Economy: Policies for the Future, warns that "our immigration policies, immigration enforcement laws, and employer sanctions all have their origins in a reaction to past social conflicts and the prevention of future conflicts that did not exist in the past." The Immigration Act of 1924 granted a green card to virtually anyone with a job offer. (The bill was inspired by the Great War experience of Americans who emigrated to the "land of opportunity.") This prompted the Immigration Act of 1965, which expanded the existing family reunification to include people from anywhere.

That is what prompted the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986, which in turn prompted the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1990. These laws passed in the 1980s and '90s contain, in their main provisions, the five fallacies Sowell identifies. The main purpose of the laws was not to encourage the "best and the brightest" to come to the United States, but to encourage low-wage-earning people to come, to replace American workers and/or to maintain the American standard of living. This purpose was thwarted by various provisions such as guest worker programs, employer sanctions, sanctuary cities, and other visa restrictions, which Sowell characterizes as "interferences into the free market." It is not that the "best and the brightest" are being discouraged from coming. There are more American college graduates than ever before in the history of the country. The problem is that the wealth they are taking away from others. The United States has more high school graduates, on average, than ever before. On the other hand, a very large percentage of these graduates end up in low-wage jobs. The U.S. economy is being harmed, not helped, by a large influx of low-wage workers. These laws, which are primarily meant to prevent illegal immigration, have encouraged employers to import cheap labor. Thus, they have created a race to the bottom of wages and working conditions
