I'm Just a Believer Today is the election, and I have been contemplating the implications. A week ago, I posted on The New Leader and included the link to my column that appeared in the Catholic New York, that touches on the issue of subsidiarity. "If we are to move forward on the road to a truly autonomous national church, we must, in the first instance, understand the foundations of the American ecclesial life." A week ago, I told you that the New Leadership is experiencing a considerable "uphill battle" with the bishops. It is not my intention to explain all the details of the leadership politics going on in the Vatican. Still, you can't help but wonder what would happen to the New Leadership if the bishops were to win the struggle at the Vatican. A week ago, I mentioned an article in my column that suggests the bishops are more concerned about American Church life than the Vatican. "Even the narrowest definition of subsidiarity recognizes that the central government, although quite powerful, cannot function effectively unless it allows more local life to flourish." A week ago, I mentioned an article in the New York Church Times entitled Pope's Sorensen: Tensions Arise from Lack of Faith. The article, which appeared in the New York Church Times, reminded us that "the Holy Father is [still] not willing to give up control of the Vatican's bureaucratic apparatus." A week ago, I listed some of the ministries of the American bishops. I suggested that these ministries are a sign that American Church life has not yet made a major contribution to the wider Church. You can't help but wonder what happens to all the generous souls that are involved in the work of the bishops? A week ago, I told you that the bishops see themselves as the principal architects of American Church life. "Elected by the people to shepherd the flock, they recognize that their office is akin to a monarchical prerogative. A week ago, I wrote: "The U.S. bishops know better than anybody that in democratic societies, sovereignty rests in the people, and that therefore the bishops are not the government." A week ago, I wrote: "In the bishops' hands, all of High- and low-risk human papillomavirus types in women with breast cancer. Human papillomavirus (HPV) is recognized as an etiologic agent for cervical cancer. Because the presence of HPV in patients with breast cancer was studied rarely, we investigated whether HPV infection would be associated with breast cancer. One hundred women (72 with primary breast cancer and 28 controls) were examined for serum antibodies to HPV using a commercial immunoassay kit. HPV DNA was detected using the INNO-LiPA HPV Genotyping Extra Assay (Innogenetics, Ghent, Belgium). A total of 29 women (29%) showed serum antibodies to HPV-16, and the prevalence of HPV-16 DNA in breast tumor cells was 33%. HPV-16 and HPV-18, the only high-risk types detectable, were found in 3.6% and 0% of the women, respectively. HPV-16 was associated with a higher risk of breast cancer (odds ratio, 4.06; 95% confidence interval, 1.25-13.29; P =.018). In a nested case-control study (36 cases and 72 controls) HPV-16 was found in 11 women (31%) and HPV-18 in 2 (6%). When the HPV-16-positive women were divided into 2 groups by their Ki-67 proliferative index (median, 26; range, 11-62), the rate of HPV-16 or HPV-18 positivity was 47.8% (8 of 17) in Ki-67 ≥ 25 (P =.05). HPV-16 infection is frequent in the sera of women with breast cancer. Also, its presence correlates with high tumor proliferation, suggesting that HPV may be associated with breast cancer progression and a more aggressive phenotype.
