As easy as saying Reddit to find a thread is like saying Google to search the Internet! Some of the extensions for the web and Chrome. Visited around 20 local coffee shops over the past week in an effort to get a reasonable handle on the overall quality of the local coffee options. It's no big secret that starbucks gets much of its popularity by abusing its power as a well respected monopoly, but it does provide a model that other companies and chains could follow. Lets get to it. These reviews are provided by independent experts in this field, and while the reviews are stored on this site, the opinions expressed are not necessarily those of The Consumerist. Note: While I only sampled coffee in the Boston area, my experiences don't really represent a full picture of what is available. There are also many fine cafes in other parts of the country. While I waited in line for a cup of coffee at Hasty Bakes (the other day), I tried to get a sense of just how common the so-called chain store coffee options are. I was only able to sample in one location (Boston), but I'd expect that a major city like Boston would be able to boast a good

But, at its core, the Internet is a complex communication channel. Without getting too much into detail about the Internet's advantages and marvels, one thing is clear, there are very few things you cannot learn online. One thing the Internet is particularly good at is allowing people around the world to learn from the experiences of others. And, since Reddit is by far the world's biggest online forum, it's easy to understand why it's the go-to place for well over a billion users on a monthly basis. So, what if there was a way to use the Internet as you normally do and be able to access some of the most relevant data on Reddit at the same time? If that sounds great, then you will definitely love Thredd.
