These XAML files are stored in a subfolder and referenced from the main app's App.xaml file like this: It will load successfully if the xaml files are just in the folder, but if they are in a subfolder, it will not load properly. In that case, I get a blank window. The strange thing is that I don't have any resource errors in the output window. The biggest difference between the two is that the working app was build on Visual Studio with the ".resx" file extension. The failing app was built on IIS and has ".resx" and ".XAML" extension files. Is there some way for me to find what is wrong here? I am using the exact same.resx file in both cases. The panel unanimously voted to pass the House of Representatives's version of the bill, approving the measure in a voice vote Friday, just hours after it was introduced. The legislation, introduced by committee Chairman Devin Nunes, a Republican, will now head to the full house for a vote. "This dangerous and unacceptable legislation would allow people like terrorists and foreign intelligence services to get around our laws and global encryption standards that protect all Americans," Obama said in a statement. US intelligence officials believe the encryption bill as written "threatens to undermine human rights and due process," the San Francisco Chronicle reported. The White House also condemned the measure as "dangerous and irresponsible." READ MORE: FBI, tech firms to talk encryption The bill was released days after the FBI and the Department of Justice filed a lawsuit against Apple over its use of encryption to protect data on iPhones, reports the Associated Press. In an interview with ABC News, Manu Gulati, a senior fellow at the Cato Institute, highlighted the importance of encryption to safety and privacy. "If you don't have encryption to protect your information, your data and communications, you don't have any way to prevent a government or a tyrant or any other entity from engaging in surveillance on you," Gulati said. "Information should be safe from abuse and that's one of the things that encryption provides." Advocates for law enforcement say the bill will increase transparency by forcing tech companies to provide government officials with access to encrypted communications. But the House bill, which has been called the "Backdoor Search Law" by the Electronic Frontier Foundation,

In the report from the National Rifle Association (NRA), the gun advocacy organization says that a "record in the annals of Congress" has occurred: more gun violence has resulted from defense against gun control measures than from the introduction of these measures. ADVERTISEMENT According to the report, 564 deaths and 23,000 injuries "resulting from the consideration or enactment of gun control in the 113th Congress were either caused by the adoption, or attempted adoption, of gun control laws." Under the current bill funding for the federal government — HR 1, the government funding bill that passed the House on Thursday — these new gun control laws are set to remain in place.
