A traditional hand-powered chipping tool comprises a hammer which is reciprocated by a crank shaft, and a chisel which is mounted to the hammer and reciprocated upon impact of the hammer by its reciprocating motion. When a pre-determined force is detected in the chisel, a switch is actuated so as to stop operation of the hammer. The switch is typically actuated by a lever which engages a camming surface of the switch in a pre-determined position, and/or by a mechanical cam on the crank shaft. This approach has several shortcomings. First, the lever is subject to fatigue and breakage, and must be replaced periodically. Secondly, the lever must be actuated by the crank shaft, and is
