Geometric morphometric study of human mandible: influence of dental malocclusion on mandibular shape. In this study, we analyzed the mandibular shape to explore its relationship with dental malocclusion. One hundred adult mandibles from European-Caucasian individuals were collected, and geometric morphometrics was used to quantify morphological variations in the morphology of the mandible. The subjects were divided into the following five groups according to their malocclusion: Class I, II, III, Class III combined with malocclusion, Class II combined with malocclusion. Morphological variables were quantified. Classification tree analysis was performed for each malocclusion group. Discriminant analysis was also conducted using the whole data set, and the confusion matrix, optimal threshold, and the overall accuracy of each group were evaluated. The classification tree analysis classified all subjects into five groups. From the largest to the smallest mean area and centroid distance, Class III had the largest area and the most distant shape, followed by Class I, Class II, Class III combined with malocclusion, and Class II combined with malocclusion. In the discriminant analysis, the overall accuracy of the subjects was found to be 93%. The shapes of mandibles with Class I, Class II, Class III, and Class III combined with malocclusion were clearly distinguished from each other. This study revealed that the shape of the mandible was closely related to dental malocclusion.
