This invention relates generally to a method of making an electromechanical transducer having an integral anchor for mounting the transducer to a structure, and the product resulting therefrom. During the normal operation of a variety of electromechanical devices, it is common to provide some means for anchoring the electromechanical device to a structure, such as a building or the deck of a ship. For example, in a conventional surveillance radar installation, a building is provided with a radome or other suitable mounting structure for receiving the radar components of the system. After the antenna is installed, an elongated structure is secured to the mounting structure by the use of bolts which are embedded in the mounting structure and which extend into the threaded apertures of the elongated structure. The bolts are tightened down to clamp the elongated structure against the mounting structure and hold the elongated structure in place. In the course of producing the electromechanical transducer, an elongated support member may be provided with at least one elongated aperture spaced along the length of the support member. The elongated support member is formed in a manner well-known in the art by rolled sheet metal material, a strip metal material or by a printed wireboard. Also, in the usual course of producing the electromechanical transducer, a metal structure is formed into an elongated resilient support member having at least one elongated aperture which is spaced along the length of the resilient member. In the formation of the electromechanical transducer, the elongated support member and the elongated resilient member are positioned side by side and aligned. Thereafter, a suitable connector structure is provided which may be a suitable electrical connector having a plurality of conductor elements such as, for example, a plurality of conductors for electrical communication with the electromechanical transducer. Thereafter, the elongated support member, the elongated resilient member, the connector structure and the conductor elements are secured together, as by a suitable d0c515b9f4
