Of course, it means that I could have more commits to check and it doesn't guarantee that I'll be able to checkout the one that actually solves the issue. For example, you could have two commits where one commits a bug while the other fixes that bug, but if you fetch from one but not the other, you would end up with a buggy solution. I use git to keep most of my code in the GitHub. While it's nice to have a backup in case I ever lose my local code, most people don't have access to GitHub directly. Plus, for private repos, it makes life easier when you're adding other people to your team (you don't have to share you password). GitHub can grant temporary access to authorized users. This is done by simply having them get an access token from GitHub directly. First, you want to go to GitHub, then click on "Settings" on the top-right. Then, you'll have a list of the users that have access to your repo (you won't see the IP addresses here, but you could if you wanted to). After that, you just have to copy the access token. You can do this by simply copying the text inside the "Authorization" field. Then, you can just run the following line on your CLI to clone the repo and set the access token : git clone --depth=1 --no-checkout Note that you don't need to share your access token when setting this up with other people. You can request them the access token or even grant access to their GitHub account. Conclusion This is a very easy way to allow people to clone a repo with a known, trusted version of your code. Using Git instead of SVN or even using a different online versioning system for the code allows for better collaboration. Of course, this does not stop people from committing code that breaks the system.
