Since the molecular alteration in hereditary and sporadic prostate cancers has started to be unravelled and an increasing number of molecular events have been linked to the disease, there is an increasing requirement for better tools for genetic analysis and diagnostic evaluation of the early stages of cancer. Despite the fact that several authors have detected altered p53 function in prostate cancer using in vivo animal models, in vitro analysis is still largely lacking. In this review, the current research on the role of p53 in the early stages of prostate cancer is summarized, taking into account the different mutations in p53 (including null mutations), the activation of p53 and the therapeutic implication for treating human prostate cancer.

The different molecular pathways involved in the progression of prostate cancer are analysed. Moreover, the current research on the study of p53 signal transduction pathways and how they may become targets for therapeutic intervention in human prostate cancer is also reviewed.

Q: How can I replicate native ScrollView Padding? I need to programmatically enable scrolling on a ScrollView. I need to trigger the scrollbar's Padding. I am creating a ScrollView programmatically by way of: `ScrollView scrollView = new ScrollView(); scrollView.setContent = someContent;` But my Padding is still regular, not blurry or 'rounded' as you see on the Windows Phone 7 emulator. Anyone know how I can replicate native ScrollView padding? If it matters, I am creating the ScrollView in an application that runs in the Phone Emulator.

A: Never mind, I got it, though I'm not sure why it works for the emulator only. Here's how you do it: `scrollView.Padding = new BorderPadding();` The padding is a property of the border. .
