Motion tracking throughout a complete football match will enable players to control movements of every player on the pitch, every time they take a touch or dribble. Importantly, all actions of these players can be controlled both individually and in a team context, allowing for more responsive, accurate and authentic football player control. In FIFA, players no longer have to go into a handball simulation to control an opponent and there are far fewer situations where a defender has to intercept and clear the ball. With tight body control in space, smart decisions and anticipating the opposition's movements, players are now less likely to commit a foul. As a result, the flow of a match is more flowing, reducing the time that teams take to move the ball, and the time that the opponent has to recover. Defending becomes easier too - team dynamics are now easier to read. The above video is looking at the various ways you can receive the authentic player experience that is FIFA. It is dedicated to V.2.0 of HyperMotion Technology, but that isn't set in stone. The introduction of this technology is a starting point, and we'll continue to evolve FIFA for the player and fans.
