MusicXML (MXML) is a very interesting and fast emerging file format. MXML is a very simple file format that can describe multiple very different file types. There are many different audio file formats in use today, some of which are proprietary, while other use the W3C web standards. MXML is an audio file format that works with many audio software programs. It is not likely that all the proprietary programs will be updated to support the new standard, but it is likely that most will be updated to support the standard. The MXML format is defined in the MXML specification. The specification is well documented and easy to understand. There are also several third party MXML specifications. One of these is Sonance's Theora MXML specification. The Ogg Theora specification also uses the MXML format as one of its sound track formats. The MXML format was first used in 2001 by Propellerhead and Logic Pro. In 2003, Apple

In this class, you will learn the basics of creating a web form that will accept a two-dimensional (2D) image as its input and that will produce a 3D form that requires no further operations from the user. The finished product will be quite cool-- an interactive 3D form. While not used to its best advantage, this technology can be used to create many types of objects. The purpose of this class is two-fold. First, we will see how to create a 2D image-based form that can take an input 2D image, convert that image to a 3D form, and have the 3D image interact with a PowerPoint slide. Second, we will examine how to use this same 2D image to "animate" the form to show changes when the user either clicks on a part of the image, or clicks on the entire form. The basic ideas in the class can be applied to many types of interactive 3D forms. The class uses a combination of MS Word, PowerPoint, and some HTML coding to...
