xml is a text-based file format that is commonly used to store information for use by software applications. xml is a general-purpose markup language and is the standard format for sharing information on the web. the format can be read by any software application. for example, the.aspx extension indicates that the file is an xml-based page. many software packages use this format to store information for presentation within their user interface. this format is commonly used in the publishing industry. you can also use this to send files to multiple recipients. downloading information from this format is much more difficult, so the .rar format was developed. this is the most current gerber format and is widely viewed as the accepted industry standard. all modern pcb layout tools will output in this format, older tools may be limited to the obsolete 274d format. 274x (extended) format is preferred since the aperture definitions for interpreting the width, size and shape of the features are embedded within each file as opposed to the original gerber rs-274d format which relies on generating a separate aperture list for each file. click here to see an example of an aperture file. matlab (.m) this is a proprietary format created from mathworks. as of this writing, we have a tool that can convert this into standard rs-274x/cnc drill format. we strongly recommend against using free fab shop software for layout since the software will only export a proprietary file format only they can open, forcing you to use their service making the software anything but free. 5ec8ef588b
